
In Singapore, as in the U.S., Savings Grow Slowly

By Editor Test Tue, Aug 24, 2010

In Singapore, HSBC Insurance has unveiled a new annuity contract called SecureIncome to help Singaporeans save for retirement. The product appears to beat putting money under the mattress, but not by much.

In Singapore, HSBC Insurance has unveiled a new annuity contract called SecureIncome to help Singaporeans save for retirement. The product appears to beat putting money under the mattress, but not by much.

Customers contribute at least $200 a month to the contract and receive a guaranteed yield of 1% to 1.5% over the life of the policy, the Business News reported. The current yield on 10-year Singapore government securities is 1.89%.

When the contract matures, policyholders can withdraw a lump sum, receive a monthly income over 10 years, or leave the money with HSBC and earn a non-guaranteed rate, currently 2.5%. Alternately, they can leave their money with HSBC for another 10 years and receive non-guaranteed monthly dividends.

The contract allows unemployed policyholders to defer payment of premiums for up to a year and to receive a death benefit in advance if they are confirmed to have a fatal illness.

HSBC Insurance CEO Walter de Oude compared SecureIncome with fixed deposits, the most popular retirement savings vehicle for Singaporeans.

"The average bank interest rate for 12-month fixed deposits has remained below one percent for the last seven years," he said, citing data from the Monetary Authority of Singapore.

© 2010 RIJ Publishing LLC. All rights reserved.

A fixed deposit of $100,000 over one year would earn 0.3% a year at Citibank and 0.35% at Standard Chartered.

Plain-vanilla deposits remain the investment of choice for Singaporeans. Eleven percent of Singaporeans expect to place their funds in an interest-bearing savings account within the next year. In contrast, only 5% percent expect to buy an annuity.