New episode in AXA Equitable's "Retirement Reality Show" series

AXA Equitable Life has released the latest episode in its "Retirement Reality Show" video series exploring the attitudes, behaviors and experiences of soon-to-retire and retired Americans.

"Life, Liberty and the Pursuit of Financial Freedom," is set against the backdrop of the Statue of Liberty. On the occasion of National Retirement Planning Week, AXA Equitable went to Liberty Island to ask people how much time they spend planning their vacations versus planning for financial freedom in retirement.

"People told us they spend three to six months, and in some cases up to a year, planning a one-week vacation but not nearly as much time planning for a retirement that could last hopefully for decades," said Chris Winans, senior vice president, External Affairs at AXA Equitable.

AXA Equitable's "Retirement Reality Show" video series complements the company's ongoing research and thought leadership programs on the issues surrounding retirement and serves as a platform for taking the public's pulse on financial risks and preparedness. The purpose of the series is to learn firsthand what real retirement savers and retirees are thinking and doing.

Retirement advisors ignore middle-income market: Bankers Life

The tendency of the financial services industry to cater to wealthy Americans could leave many middle income Americans without adequate plans for retirement, according to the Bankers Life and Casualty Company's Center for a Secure Retirement (CSR).

The CSR's Middle-Income Retirement Preparedness Study, which focused on pre-retirees and retirees with incomes from $25,000 to $75,000, found that 51% had not been contacted by any kind of retirement professional in the past 12 months. Further, 84% of the study participants who work with a retirement professional said that they initiated contact with the advisor.

The study showed that two in three (68%) middle-income Americans who work with a professional feel better prepared for retirement than their peers, and 76% said they were extremely or very satisfied with their retirement professional.

The CSR says that retirement professionals are not just portfolio managers for the wealthiest retirees. Many products and services exist for people with virtually any level of income and assets that can help make your income last.

To locate a professional retirement advisor and learn more about retirement planning, visit your local library, senior center, or search online.

The Bankers Life and Casualty Company Center for a Secure Retirement Middle-Income Retirement Preparedness Study was conducted in August of 2010 by the independent research firm The Blackstone Group. The complete report may be viewed at www.CenterForASecureRetirement.com
